The purpose of this study was to use individual difference profiles (IDPs) and mental health literacy constructs to identify the specific content knowledge and health beliefs associated with depressed mood and suicidal ideation. Methods. Data for this study were drawn from the National Comorbidity Survey Replication. We used a randomly selected subsample of the full national survey (N = 7,661) and included only the subset of the population who reported being depressed (N = 2,619) or who reported having suicidal ideation (N = 530).

We used an IDP to estimate the association of individual variables with current depression and suicidal ideation. Multiple regression models were used to assess the independent contributions of individual variables to the prediction of depression and suicidal ideation. Results. Multiple regression analyses indicated that depressed mood was independently associated with (1) lacking a suicide plan, (2) smoking, (3) poor insight, (4) being a man, (5) high risk of suicide death, (6) being homeless, and (7) not being offered mental health care. Current suicidal ideation was independently associated with (1) lack of a plan, (2) physical health, (3) low self-esteem, (4) past psychiatric treatment
