: The Bride of Lamashan Stephanie mentioned while I was in Japan last year that the Netherlands is a good European choice for on-location filming. So I asked if she could point me to a few Dutch productions. She sent me a link to the blog moviebox4. The blog was established in 2002 and has very detailed information on 2,000 production projects and 200-300 film festivals every year. In 2005 she entered this world record as the first. It would be interesting to calculate how many films and stageplays have been created with this data. During her job as a legal secretary she collected much information about many dozens of Dutch productions. She shows how much information is readily available. (What I miss in the UK is the registration of production companies.) In her post about the on-location hotel in Lithuania, Stephanie mentions that it is “a very beautiful hotel (...). Many rooms here are window-lined and panelled, some windowed, some not and all suites (and even junior rooms) are equipped with a safe and a remote controlled door and window. Air conditioning is optional but usually turned on (and usually locked), the beds are double beds. Bathrooms are large; not freezing. Dining rooms have comfortable upholstered sofas. The housekeeping staff is very attentive to house keeping with a wide range of in house services. The staff will keep rooms tidy, make your coffee if you request one, arrange daily use of a hairdryer, and leave a small gift on the pillow.” What’s so special about the hotel in Korsun? This information is part of the post with the link. The last sentence says that the hotel is located in Korsun. According to the post, Korsun is a “small town with beautiful old buildings and a few cobblestoned

streets, some pretty lakefronts and lagoons, and old village houses (Vernitskaya' - I guess there's a museum here)'' . In September I visited the Netherlands. Day one - hotel in Korsun. So some things which Stephanie told me are right. Korsun has a few old buildings, but it should be noted that most of the buildings are new. I stayed in a new hotel, a 2 hotel with 80 rooms. An excellent hotel. The rooms are neatly fitted, staff are nice, they took care of my hair and hands
